

Research Project Administration

Administration of Projects, the so-called Project management (PM), was created more than 50 years ago to realize technical development and manufacturing projects of great complexity. This concept has developed over the years and is currently defined as a set of principles and activities to follow for making the everyday decisions that keep a business running, even a small scientific research project.

More precisely, PM is a set of activities leading to the positive implementation of a project, where a project may be defined as involving a group of interrelated activities that are planned and then executed in a certain sequence to create a unique output (product or service) within a specific time frame. Research projects differ in many ways from development projects, the most relevant being sometimes lack of strong requirements and inability to plan an output from the start of the project. Moreover, today the economic and political imperatives and pressures are common across the globe. Given the increasing need for external research funding, the role of research administrators in universities or institutions is now more important than ever. The nature of research management and project administration is changing, and it is becoming more professional.

Project management skills for a successful WBC integration in the ERA

BESTPRAC and Excellence-in-ReSTI

Project management skills and research administration competences are to be considered as one of the prerequisite for successful WBC integration into the ERA. Sometimes young entrepreneurial-minded people are perceived as ‘agents of change’ in their own countries. Nevertheless these young managers still claim to be less well-versed in basics topics related to research project administration.

Networks of research managers such as the COST TN1302 BESTPRAC can play a key role in such a context and enable officers of the member societies to compare their national or regional issues, and to learn from each other as explained us Ms Andjela Pepic. As most frequently mentioned barriers, young project managers in RTDI field include the lack of proper training programmes, the need for more practical courses within higher education institutions, the missing links between academia, research and business sectors, etc. This is what moreover Mr. Gabor Szüdi – project coordinator of Excellence-in-RESTI (Excellence in research, social and technological innovation project management) reported us in an interview
